The most intense fighting began in Falluja in April, after four U.S. security contractors were killed and their dismembered bodies suspended from a bridge over the Euphrates River. Marine Lt. Gen. James T. Conway, former U.S. Marine commander of forces in western Iraq, said Sunday that he had opposed the method and timing of the U.S. response to those attacks.

Meanwhile, U.S. warplanes attacked a building Monday in Falluja where associates of al-Zarqawi were meeting, the U.S. military said. The strike followed clashes between U.S. forces and insurgents in the Sunni Muslim stronghold west of Baghdad.

A coalition statement described the attack as "a successful precision strike on a confirmed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi terrorist meeting." U.S. Air Force F-16s dropped a pair of 500-pound, satellite-guided bombs, military officials said.

Meanwhile, a group linked to al Qaeda released a video Monday apparently showing the beheading of a Turkish truck driver who was kidnapped last month in Iraq. The video was posted on the Web site of the group Unification and Jihad, led by Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Al-Zarqawi has claimed credit for several attacks on U.S.-led coalition forces, including the bombing of U.N. headquarters in Baghdad that killed 23 civilians August 2003 and the beheadings of South Korean translator Kim Sun-il and American businessman Nicholas Berg. The claims of responsibility were included in an audiotape published on a Web site in April.

Kumdereli and truck driver Mustafa Koksal were reported kidnapped in Iraq on August 14 after delivering water to a U.S. military base. It was unclear if the second man shown in the video was Koksal. After Kumdereli spoke, the video briefly goes black. It then showed him surrounded by masked men, who beheaded him. It was not clear what happened to the other man. The Bush administration has said al-Zarqawi is an al Qaeda member who fled to Iraq from Afghanistan in
